Does this not usually imply a denial, such as "unpublished" (the opposite of "published") or "incorrect" (the opposite of "correct")? Well, yeah! But "invaluable" is the opposite of "valid" to the extent that something "invaluable" is not able to be evaluated. But it doesn't mean "no value"! Summary: Valuable or Invaluable? These words can be confused, but remember: Valuable is usually an adjective meaning "destinate a lot of money" or "important". In addition, people often use the plural noun "values" to refer to small objects of high value, such as jewelry. Invaluable is always an adjective and means "no price" or "essential". When using these words, keep in mind that "invaluable" doesn't just mean "valid a lot of money." So, you should only use "invaluable" when something is priceless or essential, not only "valid" in the monetary sense.
